

Join the Conversation about Native Bees

What's the buzz?

North America has over 4,400 described species of native bees* that pollinate wildflowers and crops. From the tiny Perdita minima to the substantial carpenter bee (Xylocopa varipuncta), these local pollinators are hard at work in the floral landscapes of gardens, farms, forests, grasslands and urban and wild lands. Unfortunately, several species of native bees are showing disturbing signs of decline. Learn more about these colorful pollinators and how you can support them at www.pollinator.org

